My Device

I created a device. I wanted to make something with unlimited potential. I found out how everything around me worked. I figured out what makes clocks tick and what makes the ground solid and what makes light go faster than anything. I learned everything I could and I wrote it all down.

When I knew everything I needed to know I made something. I made it out of everything that I had learned. I made it so that everything inside of it worked just like everything around me works. Then I watched it.

I watched it swirl and churn and burp and growl. I watched it heat and explode and coalesce. After awhile I could see places inside of it that looked exactly like everything around me. I could even see little things inside that looked like me.

The little things inside were like me because they tried to learn everything about everything around them. They learned fast.

When they had figured out everything about everything around them they built something. They built it so it worked just like everything around them worked. Then they watched it.
